NEIGHBOURHOOD CHILDREN DISCOVER STICK WITH EXCEPTIONAL QUALITIES

Local children believe they may have changed the course of history.

BY THE DAILY QUEST SCIENCE DESK

Three neighbourhood children are claiming a major scientific breakthrough after discovering a strangely curved stick in a local park. The discovery was made Thursday afternoon by eight-year-old Tyler, who initially believed the object might be a sword. His friend Connor suggested a wizard's wand, while seven-year-old Emily maintained that it was probably a dinosaur bone.

Things took an unexpected turn when Tyler threw the stick across the park.

It came back.

"We couldn't believe it," Tyler said. "So I threw it again."

It came back again.

By lunchtime Friday, the group had expanded to seven children. One brought a notebook to record their findings. Another appointed himself head of marketing.

After considerable debate, the children agreed to name their invention the Boomerang.

"We think it's going to be pretty big," Tyler told reporters.

A local historian later explained that boomerangs have existed for thousands of years, with a particularly long history among Aboriginal Australian peoples.

Tyler was unimpressed.

"Well, I've never seen one."

The children are currently applying for a patent.

TODAY'S WEATHER

FORECAST: A 60% chance of something happening outside.
WIND: Enough to make you reconsider that hat.
OFFICIAL ADVICE: Take a jacket. Your mother was right.

THE DAILY ASSIGNMENT

OPERATION: THE GREAT REDISCOVERY

The Daily Quest Science Desk has received reports that perfectly interesting things are being overlooked every day. Today, we'd like you to investigate. Take a short walk somewhere familiar. Look a little closer than you usually do. Find something you've never really noticed before. An unusual stone, a crooked tree, an interesting building, or something you can't quite identify. You don't need to photograph it, post about it or tell anyone. Just notice it. BONUS CREDIT: Give your discovery a ridiculously important name. Please leave plants, wildlife and other people's property undisturbed.

LOCAL MAN DISCOVERS GROCERIES NOW CONSIDERED LUXURY GOODS

Shopping trip raises questions about the purchasing power of fifty dollars.

BY THE DAILY QUEST BUSINESS DESK

A local man entered a grocery store Thursday afternoon carrying $50 and what he described as "a pretty short list." He emerged twenty minutes later with two tomatoes, a loaf of bread and a receipt he has since shown to several neighbours.

"I didn't even buy anything good," he said.

The man, who asked not to be identified because he intends to shop there again, said he spent several minutes comparing the prices of cereal before abandoning the idea altogether.

"They're charging more for less cereal. I don't understand how that works."

A spokesperson for the breakfast food industry offered a different perspective.

"We haven't reduced the amount of cereal. We've increased the amount of box."

The man returned to the store later that evening to purchase a carton of eggs.

A financing application is pending.

LOCAL MAN FINISHES BOOK HE STARTED IN 2019

Family cautiously optimistic about further reading.

BY THE DAILY QUEST ARTS & CULTURE DESK

After seven years, a local man has finally finished the novel that has occupied his bedside table since the summer of 2019. The book had spent much of that time beneath a lamp, several receipts and a television remote.

"I just kept turning the pages," he explained. "Eventually there weren't any left."

His wife confirmed that the achievement had been a long time coming.

"He's been saying he's almost finished since 2021. We stopped asking."

Family members briefly considered organizing a celebration, but decided against it after the man announced that he might start another book.

"We don't want to put pressure on him," his wife said.

The local library has congratulated him and requested the return of fourteen other books.

He says he'll get around to it.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A COMPLAINT FROM A LOCAL SQUIRREL

Dear Editor,

I have lived in this park for six years, and frankly, things are getting out of hand.

First, people started sitting under my tree. Then someone put a bench there. Now there are children throwing sticks around.

Yesterday, a man sat on the grass for almost an hour, doing absolutely nothing.

That's my job.

And while we're on the subject, please stop feeding the ducks. They're getting enormous.

Yours sincerely,

A Concerned Squirrel

Third Branch, Large Oak Near the Pond

Editor's note: The ducks declined to comment.
